Five ways to make historic house museum visitors feel at home (even with uncomfortable topics)

One common criticism of historic house museums is they are static and impersonal. Even when curators and interpreters try to make the house look “lived in,” it often fails to invoke the feeling of home for their visitors. How can we expand our focus to help visitors better understand the practice of history through the stories we tell and the artifacts we display in our historic house museums?

Out of The Shadows: reinterpreting a National Trust historic site

Interpretation at The Shadows-on-the-Teche in Louisiana for many years followed traditional models. Tours focused on the white proprietors David and Mary Weeks with a heavy emphasis on life as they and their descendants experienced it in the house.

In 2020, they contracted a researcher to look at previously excluded African descendants who lived and labored at the property, as well as the Chitimacha and Atkapan-Ishak, area Native American residents. The researcher made crucial and deliberate connections, identifying and reaching out to descendant communities. As a result, The Shadows actively presents exhibits on enslavement and labor, rather than presenting it as a historical footnote.

Blue Star Museum program opens

The National Endowment for the Arts has opened registration for the Blue Star Museums program. This program encourages museums, historic sites, historic houses, etc. to offer free admission to active-duty military personnel and up to five family members. If your institution already offers free admission to all, you are still encouraged to register, as it will give your museum a national platform and access to marketing materials to promote your museum to the military community. The program will launch on May 21 (Armed Forces Day) and will run through Labor Day (September 5).

The American Alliance of Museums report, TrendsWatch: Museums as Community Infrastructure makes the case that museums are vital public infrastructure by virtue of their contributions to five pillars of community strength and resilience. Use it to be inspired, to help shape conversations within your museums and with your stakeholders, and to look outward as our field aims to spur increasing public support of museums. The five pillars are:

- Education for our children
- Livable communities for our elders
- Mental health
- Emergency response in the face of disasters
- A human-centered culture of sustainability
